

Animals - are they almost people?

Lone Frank

Current research into the cognition and emotional lives of different animals is revealing surprising sophistication even among "lower" animals. When we hear about grieving monkeys and altruistic rats full of empathy for each other our view of what we can do to animals changes. What does this mean for animal use in research? And does the debate surrounding animal research lead to a wider debate about which experiments are actually necessary?